

LINK TO VIDEO
<https://youtu.be/8DxNk9gTUlo>

Police brutality, the rising homeless crisis, xenophobia, exclusion, and the underlying layer of racism are issues that plague our society today.

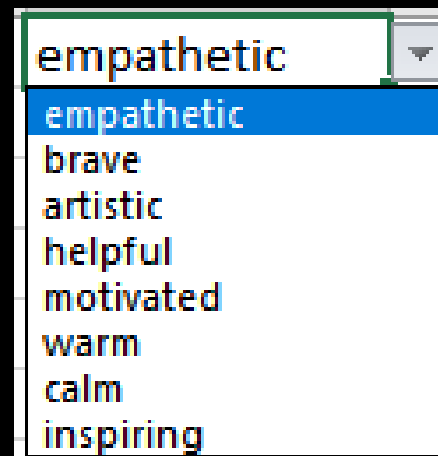

Our built environment facilitates majority these issues, be it the heavily guarded urban centers, pristine buildings that only serve the rich or the anti homeless spikes to repulse rough sleepers.

However, there are certain spaces that are inclusive to everyone and show empathy rather than excluding people.

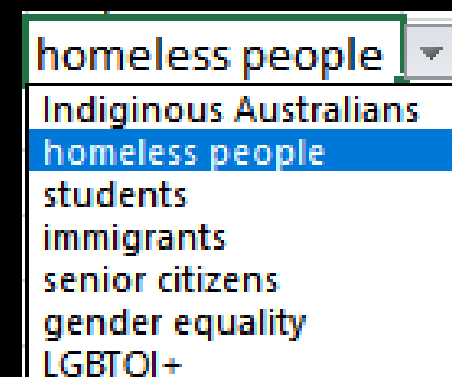

A train pole is one such example as it comforts anyone and everyone that requires its support.

It is a play place for children to play on a mundane train journey, a dancing pole for drunk teenagers on a night out, a place for a cripple to hold onto, and a support to every worker commuter in the rush hour back home

why can't the built environment be more towards

... like the train pole?

